TREATMENT OF BALKY HORSES.

THE Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has put forth the following rules for the treatment of balky horses, which should command the attention of owners of animals addicted to that provoking habit:

1. Pat the horse upon the neck; examine the harness carefully, first on one side and then on the other, speaking encouragingly while doing so; and then jump into the wagon and give the word go; generally he will obey.

2. A teamster in Maine says he can start the worst balky horse by taking him from the shafts and making him go in a circle till he is giddy. If the first [illegible] of the sort doesn't cure him, the [illegible]

3. To c[illegible] your h[illegible] off his [illegible] let him go.

4. The brain of [illegible] tain but one idea [illegible] continued whipping only [illegible] resolve. If you can [illegible] a new subject to think o[illegible] have no trouble in sta[illegible] remedy is to take a co[illegible] wine around the fore[illegible] knee, tight enough for [illegible] and tie in a bowknot. At [illegible] he will go dancing off [illegible] short distance you can [illegible] the string to prevent injury to the [illegible] in your further drive.

5. Take the tail of the horse between [illegible] hind legs and tie it with a cord to [illegible] the girth.

6. Tie a string around the [illegible] close to his head.

The Farmer's Union suggests that in following any of the above rules, [illegible] manager of the horse does not lose his own temper and become more balky than the horse. It is a very common remark [illegible] there are more balky drivers than horses. A driver who does not control himself [illegible] will be very likely to lose control of a balky horse.

A CONTEST OF UGLINESS.

GEORGE II. had a Master of Revels named Heidegger, who was egregiously ugly. It amounted to a distinction. So much so that two young gentlemen were found prepared to advance the proposition that Heidegger was the ugliest human being in England. The wager was offered and was taken. London was ransacked for native deformity, and some very remarkable specimens of uncouthness and misproportion were discovered. At last in St. Giles's one old woman was detected whose unsightliness seemed to surpass anything that could have been believed. She and Heidegger were brought face to face, and the latter, who was proud of his personal appearance, admitted that he had at length met his match. But it is the advantage of a contest on which a bet depends that there are plenty of persons interested and standing by to see fair play done. One of Heidegger's supporters remarked that the old woman owed much of her expression to her bonnet, and he suggested that, to make the contest perfectly fair, Heidegger should put on the bonnet too. The Master of Revels assented, and so did those who backed the old woman's supporters. Heidegger accordingly looked so excruciatingly ugly that the bet could no longer be disputed. The Master of the Revels triumphantly maintained his position of being the ugliest of his Majesty's subjects.

PROBABLY the largest mass of rock that has ever been transported, not excepting even the blocks in the Egyptian Pyramids, was that from which was cut the pedestal of the statue of Peter the Great, in St. Petersburg. It is a block of granite weighing three million pounds, or about one thousand five hundred tons, and was found isolated on marshy ground about [illegible] miles from the Neva. Its shape was of an irregular prism, about [illegible] feet high, forty-seven feet long [illegible] feet broad in its largest dimensions.

There is one thing in this world wherein men and flies are equally silly. They both yield to the attractive power of "lasses.

BUDDHA'S COMPASSION.

BY HATTIE TYNG GRISWOLD.

O WORLD, sweet world, I love you so,
Your very rocks and dust I clasp,
I melt your cold with fervent heat,
I hold you in my eager grasp.

No lover have you had till now,
Who held your beauty at such worth;
I bow before you, as devout
As any saint of wondrous birth.

But world, sweet world, I pity so
The sorrows which your children feel,
In pure compassion I bow down,
In helpless sympathy I kneel.

I hunger with all want and woe,
I suffer with all sick, distressed,
I mourn with all who suffer loss,
I am imprisoned with th' oppressed;

With all the lonely ones I yearn,
With all forsaken am [illegible];
Where sinners sin, I hear the [illegible];
Where martyrs burn, my soul is seared;

With souls in thrall I travail too,
Striving with them to rend their chains;
Where hearts [illegible] their w[illegible],
I pierce my heart with all their pains.

With suffering brutes I feel the lash,
With helpless children cry and moan,
With slaves and servitors I serve,
With all the helpless I am prone.

With all bond peoples I am bound:
Wh[illegible] nations tyrants crush,
I too [illegible], and with them sit,
In that [illegible] calm and hush.

With all the fainting hearts I doubt,
With all the hopeless I despair,
W[illegible] for death I cry,
Praying [illegible] answer to their prayer.

So world, sweet world, although I love,
Yo[illegible] grow more fair,
[illegible]
The way I seek through fast and prayer.

Your [illegible] I now forsake,
[illegible]
Th[illegible]
Th[illegible] train of [illegible]

THE WEDMORES' "HOP."

A JERSEY STORY.

"My dear, they are as good as engaged; [illegible] together [illegible] and two years [illegible] sixteen, there was a [illegible]. Miss Fox, in her usual [illegible] Colonel [illegible] on the [illegible] was as [illegible], and Gertie [illegible] for six months [illegible] and ever since then, whenever Percy has been over here, six [illegible] at every [illegible] whether Miss [illegible] it or not. I suppose, now Percy has this money left him, it will be [illegible]."

So spoke Miss May Faulkner, a Jersey belle, aged twenty, to her companion, Clare Grattan, a girl two years her senior, who had come from England on a visit to the Clives above mentioned.

The girls were strolling slowly along the St. Helier's broad white sands; they were lagging rather behind the rest of their party, which had split itself up into two other couples.

Clare Grattan's heart was heavy with a dull oppression of pain, the result of a fear become a reality, as she answered:

"Then you think Mr. Moray"—there was a momentary pause before she spoke this name—"and Gertie care for one another?"

"Think so? Look there!"

As May spoke she pointed to the figures of a young girl and man, who were standing almost at the water's edge, their outlines sharply defined against the sunset glow. Their faces were turned toward the sea, away from Clare; but she, looking at the young man's bent head, the girl's upturned one, could fancy only too well the look of Percival Moray's brown eyes. Had she not known it to her own cost?

She had been a fool, she thought, and only that afternoon had been happy in her folly. Clare Grattan had only been six weeks at Jersey, but that time had been fuller and more intense to her than all the years of her yet early womanhood. She had learned her own heart at length, had grown into love.

For the last month she had found herself whenever she was at a dance, waiting with a feverish impatience for the advent of a tall, slight figure, with a bright, honest face, the charm of which it was difficult to analyze, but impossible not to feel. She had noticed every morning, as she sat in the breakfast room with Gertie, for a cheery voice calling them from the garden below, and begging them to come out for a [illegible] lawn-tennis; and she had felt a new strange pleasure in the rare talks in which Percival seemed to show her glimpses of that other soul which a man keeps to show a woman when he loves her." He said no one else had ever done, and she had fancied that he w[illegible] know that he loved her.

And yet she had fears sometimes—and, as it had proved, had had reasons for her fears, that Gertie and Percival had loved one another—and how, thought Clare now, could any girl who had once cared for Percival Moray become indifferent to him?

Clare still was pondering when Gertie turned her steps toward her friends.

"Do you know that it is near seven o'clock, Clare? We shall have a nice scolding from auntie if we are late for dinner, and we promised to be at the Wedmores' by a quarter to nine."

Clare smiled faintly.

"How terribly fagged you do look! Not at all like waltzing. These last three nights have been too much for you."

"Are you tired?" asked Percy of Miss Grattan, turning toward her.

If he [illegible] shown the sharp thrill of pain the [illegible] voice caused her! She was grateful [illegible] her own sound unconstrained as she answered;

"Not at all, thank you."

"We have come too far along the sands; I ought to have remembered. Won't you take my arm?"

"Oh, no; I am all right."

He said no more, but, turning again to Gertie, called out to two other individuals who had apparently forgotten everything else in the contemplation of a dead starfish; at all events they had been gazing at it for full five minutes when Percy's voice reached them.

"Halloo, Rashton! come on; it's getting late."

Thus addressed, the two defaulters moved slowly toward the rest of the little group. Their conversation, as they strolled along, was after this wise:

"Be a brick, Miss Wedmore, and try to give a miserable wretch a chance."

"How can I? I can't make Gertie like you."

"Keep that fellow Moray out of the way, so that I may try my luck at least."

"[illegible] doing your best to ruin [illegible] by seeming to flirt with me Gertie is awfully jealous, mind."

"Hang it! I beg your pardon, I mean——"

"You needn't, I don't mind it."

"I think I have most reason for jealousy. Why, I know that she and Moray were spoons once, even if they are not now."

"Yes, but Gertie can't know that I am only playing confidante."

"Never you mind; only help me, and you shall see what the bridesmaids' lockets will be like."

"For shame, Captain Rashton! bribery and corruption! By the way I have a weakness for opals."

"I'll make a note of that," answered Captain Rashton, taking out his pocket-book for the purpose.

Certainly, to an uninitiated eye, the two had decidedly as much the appearance of flirting as Percival and Gertie had, and a keen observer might have connected that fact with the wrathful flash of Miss Clive's blue eyes, and her sharp, petulant answers when addressed. Clare did not do so, but imagined that these signs of ill-temper in her friend were owing to some fault of Percy's, and inwardly determined, now that she knew of the understanding between Mr. Moray and Gertie, to abstain even from any appearance of intimacy with the former, lest it should wound her friend, whom she knew was a little inclined to be exacting.

"She needn't be afraid, though," thought poor Clare to herself. "I know he is true. If he loved me, I would trust him entirely."

The party broke up at the top of King Street, Florence Wedmore going one way, and the three other girls holding the opposite course.

"Good by for an hour and a half," said Florence. "Captain Rashton and Percy, you are to come back home with me and give the floors a last polish."

If Gertie's face could be said to be dark at any time, it certainly was as she, with Clare and May, turned toward that quarter of St. Helier's popularly known as "the Shingles."

"What a flirt Florence is!" she remarked, with virtuous indignation.

"People who live in glass-houses," answered May. "The idea of you accusing any one of flirting, Gertie, is rather too fine, considering the way you have always treated Percy."

"Percy and I understand one another," answered Gertie, curtly.

Meanwhile Clare, in her room, was trying to convince herself against her heart's assurance that Percy did not love her, and that if he did (illogical but girlish sequence), it was her duty to Gertie to reject his affection, and bid him render it to her to whom it was due.

She would be loyal to her friend at all costs to herself.

A light tap at the door, and Gertie entered, looking very pretty in a soft white silk, much smothered with lace.

"How shall I do, Clare?"

"I never saw you look so well," said Miss Grattan, and she spoke the truth. Gertie's eyes were shining like bits of sunlit summer sea; her cheeks "as crimson dyed ingrain;" her fair hair was ruffled in that sweet order of disorder which best suits a Greuze face and low white brow.

"Will you put in my flowers?" said Gertie, holding up the great pink bells of the belladonna lily for Clare to fasten in her hair.

"Thank you, dear," as it was accomplished, and the little lady pirouetted round, humming a waltz in a manner which caused Clare to exclaim:

"Gertie, are you bewitched? What is the matter with you?"

"Nothing," said Gertie, bursting out singing in her sweet, rather small soprano:

"Si vous n'avez rien à me dire,
Pourquoi venir auprès de moi?"

Oh, Clare, how badly Miss Fox sang that the other night, like a peacock with the influenza! And she needn't ask the question, considering how people avoid her."

"Still, the question is rather a pertinent one sometimes," said Clare lightly, yet with a ring of pain in her tone.

"Yes," said Gertie, bitterly; then with a sudden faltering of her voice, and a burst of tears, "Oh, Clare, I am so unhappy!"

Clare put her arms around her and let her sob for a few moments in silence, then she spoke.

"I am very sorry; but, Gertie, you needn't be afraid; I am sure he cares for you." Her words were very brave, and her lips did not tremble as she spoke.

"Do you think so?" and Gertie lifted her head from where it rested on her friend's breast. "But why does he flirt so? I am proud and don't show it, but it pains me dreadfully, Clare. I feel sometimes as if—oh, why should he hurt me when I love him?"

"Is she trying to ask me not to flirt with him?" thought Gertie's friend, and the hot glow of wounded pride, far deeper and stronger than that of the younger girl, burned her pale cheek at the idea that she, Clare Grattan, should be suspected of flirting. It was some little time before she slowly answered:

"I should trust him and be sure he deserves it; and, Gertie"—she spoke nervously and as if frightened lest her friend should be offended—"I wouldn't give him any cause for jealousy by being too much to-night with——"

"There's the carriage," said Gertie, springing up. "I am very sorry, dear, I can't take your advice, as it's the exact opposite to what I mean to do. I shall treat him just as he treats me."

With which words Miss Clive ran down stairs, and Clare had no opportunity for saying more.

Percival Moray was a lieutenant of Hussars whose father lived in Jersey. The boy himself, when a child, became a favorite with his mother's brother, who proclaimed him as his heir, petted him as a child, sent him to Eton, bought him his commission, only asking in return that he should spend half of his holidays and leaves with him, and who had died a twelvemonth ago, leaving Percy two thousand a year, and a pretty old house in Kent.

So two months before this evening, Moray sold out and came over to Jersey to win the old love; when, to his great disgust, he discovered that he no longer cared for her, nor she for him. Still they went on playing at love till Clare Grattan came on her visit to the Clives and Percy fell honestly, heartily in love with her.

Nevertheless, he felt he was, in a manner, bound to marry Gertie if she wished it—and it was hardly likely, he thought, that she did not; for the girl was full of wounded pride and indignation against the man she loved, and held the sweet jest up by dancing, talking, and flirting with Percy so desperately that she deceived both him and Captain Rashton into the idea that she was in love with the former.

It was full half an hour before Percy was able to gain Clare's side and ask for "the dance you promised me."

She knew it would be far more marked if she refused, so took his arm as the first bars of the waltz sounded.

Clare was fond of waltzing, and Percy's long, swinging, yet perfectly smooth step suited her better than any other. She could not help enjoying the swift motion, and the certainty that under his guidance she was safe from the merciless knocking and bumping against other couples to which many men subject their unfortunate partners.

The last slow chords sounded, and they stopped.

"Ah," said Percy, drawing a long breath, "it's warm."

"It is," assented Clare.

"But the garden is cool," said Percy.

"So people seem to think," she answered, laughing.

For every one had poured out of the ball-room into the cool night air, and the white [illegible] glimmered dimly among the trees on the small lawn.

"They have placed the refreshment-table out there," said the young man. "Don't you want some claret cup?"

The want was supplied, and they sat down on a rustic seat near the table. The lawn seemed nearly as full as the dancing-room had been a few minutes before; and Clare watched Gertie, as she was evidently engaged in a furious flirtation with a man whom she knew Percy disliked.

"She must do it to vex him," Clare thought, quite ignorant that Gertie had not once thought of Mr. Moray this evening.

From the veranda sounded the warning bars of a galop, and the lawn began to be deserted. Clare would have risen, but Percy stopped her.

"Don't go yet," he said; "at least, if you are not engaged for this."

"But I am."

"Then let your partner find you."

"No, I really must go. I want to——"

"Oh, I know what you want—to avoid me."

"Mr. Moray!"

"I beg your pardon if I am rude; but how have I offended you?"

"You have not."

"Then why do you always try to escape speaking to me? What have I done?"

"Nothing. I——"

"Why do you stop? Oh, Clare, Clare! don't you know that I love you?"

There was silence. For one moment a great pulse of joy throbbed through the girl's whole being; then came the sickening remembrance of Gertie.

"You don't speak; you do care for me! I know it, my Clare!"

He would have taken her hand, but she withdrew it.

"How about Gertie?" she said, quietly. "Are you not engaged?"

He did not answer for a moment; then said:

"Is that childish bond to stand between you and me? Clare, Gertie and I are nothing to each other now; we have outgrown our fancy long ago."

"You may have; she has not. Percy, if I trust you with her heart secret, respect it. She loves you, and all her gayety is put on [illegible]. Oh, think how [illegible] I must feel—her friend whom she trusted—to let you speak so to me!"

"You base! you, Clare darling! I've been a thoughtless brute; and I see it now. Forgive me!"

"Yes."

"And love me?"

He spoke timidly, as knowing he would be denied. Her answer came very low.

"I shall have to learn not to do so."

"Then you do?" he said, quickly.

"I cannot help it;" and there was a break of a sob in her voice.

"And you ask me to give you up, knowing that to win my heaven on earth, and turn away from it? Clare, you cannot."

"I must!" and the bitter agony of the tone only showed the firmness of her resolve.

"Percy, you are honorable; don't make me despise you, as I should if you were false to Gertie."

"But, Clare, I love you, not Gertie."

"She loves you," Clare answered, with the sublime unreasonableness of a woman. "And right is right, though it is hard—oh, so hard!"

"It is something to hear you say that it is hard," he answered, in a smothered tone. "But you don't know how cruel you are to me, or how you have grown into my life. I never meant to love; but this evening, when I saw you I felt I must speak and know if you——"

She laid her hand on his.

"And you have made it all the harder for me," he said. "If I had still thought that you did not care for me, I might have turned to Gertie; but now——"

"You will do what is right," she answered, while the tears would spring to her eyes.

"Right! Is it right to marry a girl I do not love?"

"You will learn to do so; she is so dear, you cannot help it."

"Cannot I? Clare, your face is the one face for me on earth; you the one woman."

She rose, blindly, nobly wrong in her self-denial.

"I cannot listen to more," she said, in a choked voice; to her own heart she added, "I dare not."

"Clare!" he rose and caught her wrists. There was no one to see; the garden was again dark and silent, except where the light streamed from the veranda. "I only want to say good-by."

"What do you mean?"

"Do you think I could go on as I am doing now—see you for the next month every day, and know that you love me, and that you will never be more to me than now? It would drive me mad. No, I shall leave here by to-morrow's boat."

"But, Percy——"

"You need not think that," he said, with a sudden fierce burst of anger; "if she and I were alone on this earth, I would not marry Gertie. You have done her no good—or, rather, no harm. Dear little thing, she deserves a better fate than a husband who does not care for her."

There was silence; then Percy spoke again, his voice strangely subdued and gentle.

"One kiss, Clare, for our good-by; only one, my own."

"No," she said; and her tone was both stern and surprised.

He said no more; side by side they returned to the house. Clare's heart was full with the unutterable longing to turn to the man beside her and say, "Percy;" Percy's with a wild turmoil of anger and love. He felt dimly that his love gave him a right over Clare; that her power, "woman-like to weave sweet words," had been exercised wrongly; that her sacrifice was a needless one, which would mar both their lives, and for no good.

A hard grasp of her hand, a low-spoken good-by in answer to her whispered "Forgive me!" and he was gone. When would she see him again? Dizzy and faint with dull misery, she sat down in the veranda.

The dance was over. The two girls climbed rather wearily up the bedroom stairs of the Retreat.

"Come in here, Clare," said Gertie, as they reached the latter's door.

Clare's wearied eyes looked piteously at her friend, as her lips repeated for the third time that evening the excuse, "I am so tired."

"Only for a minute, dear." Gertie drew her in and shut the door; then said "You were right."

"What do you mean?" asked Clare, stupidly amazed.

"He loves me," said Gertie, pressing her small hands close against the faded pink lilies on her breast; "he always has, and I was only a little fool to think he was flirting with Florence."

"He! Who is 'he'?"

"Robert—I mean Captain Rashton. Clare, are you ill?"

For Clare's face was white, her eyes closed, the heavily cut lips closed together.

"No, Gertie, I am quite well. But I don't understand. Don't you love Percy—Mr. Moray?"

"Love Percy! I left off doing so more than a year ago. I only used him as a decoy-duck to draw Robert on."

"And in doing so may have unknowingly wrought evil to two people," thought poor Clare.

Percy was to leave Jersey on the morrow; she might never see him again; he might go abroad, and never hear of the real state of things.

But she remembered it was hardly likely that a man possessing both relations and friends in Jersey would not hear very quickly of his old love's engagement to another man; and she wished Gertie happiness very warmly, and was glad in her gladness, staying with her more than half an hour, listening to her talk about Captain Rashton.

She was glad to be alone, though, in her own room—alone, free to thank God for the great happiness which yet might be hers.

And was; for in less than a fortnight after Clare was standing under the shade of a tall flowering myrtle, the aromatic scent of which filled the autumn air with bitter sweetness. Percy was beside her, very gravely contented, and on her left hand was the shimmer of a sapphire ring she had only worn a week.

"You came back very quickly," she said. "Were you afraid I should forget you?"

"I wanted to be sure," he answered.

"You needn't have been afraid," and her face glowed a little. "Percy?"

"Clare?"

"Do you know, I almost think I was in the wrong that night."

"I am sure you were."

She laughed, but her tone was grave as she said, "Are you angry with me?"

"Angry with you for showing how strong you were to do what seemed right to you? You must think me a brute, Clare!"

"It seemed to tear my heart out to have to deny you; and I see I was wrong now."

"So do I; but I am not sorry for it, Clare, for it taught me"—he drew her closer to him as he spoke—"how far above myself is the woman I love."

AFTER MASS IN A FRENCH CANADIAN VILLAGE.

AFTER mass we gathered again in groups in front of the church. The parents were now triumphant in the strength of their opposition to emigration, and the young people were quite ashamed and subdued.

But the Sunday business was not yet done. The town crier gathered everybody about him, while he made his weekly announcements. He is still the county newspaper of Canada. But, so far from being a literary emporium, he frequently cannot read or write. He has, however, sufficient tongue, memory, and assurance to deliver quite a column of public and private matter. He is often unwittingly comical, his pompous air being a ludicrous contrast to the simple facts he has to tell, and the illiterate blunders of his speech. First come the official announcements, legal advertisements, sheriff's sales, police regulations, road-master's notices, new laws, etc.; then private announcements are cried out—auctions, things lost and found, opening of new stores, new professional offices, etc. Sometimes he sells a pig or a calf "for the infant Jesus," the product of the sale being given to a collection for the poor. Not long ago horse races were advertised by him, to take place on the road right after mass. The crier of this day closed his list by announcing that the parish had an insurance policy to pay to one of its citizens. It seems that a parish generally insures itself. When any one loses his buildings by fire, some one solicits subscriptions to restore them. Each neighbor hauls a stick or two; the people ask permission of the priest to work on Sunday; and after mass they assemble and erect the building. If the loser be very poor, carpenters are hired to finish the work for him. A portion of the congregation went away up the northern mountain that day, and spent the afternoon raising a log-house and barn. All sorts of public assemblies are held in front of the church, just after mass. Indeed, Sunday is the most animated day of the week in social, industrial, and political matters, as well as religious.

EFFECTS OF ELECTRIC LIGHT ON HEALTH.—This question was lately discussed at a meeting of the Hygienic Society of Hamburg, and Dr. Kruss explained his views on the subject at some length. He referred to the influence of the electric light on the human eyesight and expressed his opinion that it produces no evil effects, the light having a violet tinge under most circumstances. He referred to the somewhat exaggerated expectations which had been formed as to the distance at which the light was visible at sea; but, on the whole, he considered that the safety of human life at sea had been increased by the use of the electric light in lighthouses. The electric light being free from the disadvantages incidental to the combustion of gas, in the consumption of oxygen and the production of carbonic acid, he considered its development as being a hygienic measure of relative importance.

Woman has many advantages over man; one of them is that his will has no operation till he is dead, whereas hers generally takes effect in her lifetime.

A robust countryman, meeting a physician, ran to hide himself behind a wall. Being asked the cause, he replied: "It is so long since I have been sick, that I am ashamed to look a physician in the face."

An old lady, whose son was about to proceed to the Black Sea, among her parting admonitions gave him strict injunctions not to bathe in that sea, for she did not want him to come home a "nigger."

That was a triumphal appeal of the lover of antiquity, who, in arguing the superiority of an old architecture over the new, said: "Where will you find any modern building that has lasted so long as the ancient?"

A bad egg may always be known by the manner in which it lies in the water, if placed in it. If good, it invariably lies upon its side. Some bad eggs that we know are also proved by the way they lie.

"The man whose hardy spirit doth engage
To lash the vices of a guilty age,
At his first setting forward ought to know
That every rogue he meets will be his foe."

Mr. Justice Page was renowned for his ferocity upon the bench. While going on a circuit, a facetious lawyer named Crowle was asked if "the judge was not just behind." "I don't know," said Crowle, "but if he is, I am sure he was never just before."

An Irishman was accused of stealing a handkerchief from a fellow traveler, but the owner, on finding it, apologized to Pat, and said it was a mistake. "Arrah, my jewel," retorted Pat, "It was a two-sided mistake—you took me for a thaif, and I took you for a gentleman."

A medical student joined, without invitation, a party dining at an inn. After dinner, he boasted so much of his abilities that one of the party said, "You have told us enough of what you can do; tell us something you cannot do." "Faith," said he, "I cannot pay my share of the reckoning."

A lover received the following note, accompanied by a beautiful bouquet: "Deer——, I send bi the boy a buckett of flours. They is like my love for u. The nite shaid menes kepe dark. The dog fenil menes I am ure slaive. Rôsis red and possis pail; mi luv for u shall never fale."

"Don't you think," said a brother lawyer to Judge Underwood, "that Jim Pierson is the greatest liar of a lawyer that you ever saw?" "I should be sorry to say that of Brother Pierson," replied the judge; "but he is certainly more economical of the truth than any other lawyer on the circuit!"

M. Talleyrand was enjoying his rubber, when the conversation turned on a recent marriage of an elderly lady of respectable rank. "How ever could Madame de S— make such a match? a person of her birth to marry a valet-de-chambre!" "Ah," replied Talleyrand, "it was late in the game; at nine we don't reckon honors."

"Why, Bridget," said her mistress, who wished to rally Bridget for the amusement of her company, upon the fantastic ornamenting of a huge pie: "Why, Bridget, did you do this, you're quite an artist; how did you do it?" "Indade, it was myself that did it," replied Bridget, "isn't it pritty, mum? I did it with your false teeth, mum."

"Going to leave, Mary?" "Yes, mum; I find I am very discontented." "If there is anything I can do to make you comfortable, let me know." "No, mum, it's impossible. You can't alter your figger to my figger, no mor'n I can. Your dresses won't fit me, and I can't appear on Sundays as I used—at my last place, where missus's clothes fitted 'xactly."

"Stranger, where mought you be from?" "Madam, I reside in Shelby county, Kentucky." "Wall, stranger, hope no offence, but what mought you be doin' way up here?" "Madam, I am searching for the lost sheep of the house of Israel." "John, John!" shouted the old lady, "come right here this minit; here's a stranger all the way from Shelby county, Kentucky, a huntin' stock, and I'll jest bet my life that that tangled-haired old black ram that's been in our lot last week is one of his'n!"

"Well, my lad, where are you traveling this stormy weather, all alone?" asked an inquisitive landlord, of a small lad, whose father was engaged in smuggling, and had sent him, young as he was, on an important message, in advance of the party. "Going to draw my pension," was the reply. "Pension?" echoed the astonished landlord; "what does so small a lad as you draw a pension for?" "Minding my own business, and letting that of others alone!"

When Fortune smiles, and looks serene,
'Tis—"Sir, how do ye do?
Your family are well, I hope.
Can I serve them or you?"

But turn the scale—let Fortune frown,
And ills and woes fly t'ye.
'Tis then—"I'm sorry for your loss,
But times are hard. Good-bye t'ye!"

DEATH OF GENERAL GRANT.

"I Do not want anybody to be distressed on my account."

After months of patient waiting for the final summons, America's greatest soldier, General Ulysses S. Grant, passed away quietly and peacefully, and surrounded by every member of his family, at 8:08 on last Thursday morning at Mt. McGregor, New York. The great change in his condition set in on Tuesday night, and on Wednesday he failed rapidly, and at 2:15 that afternoon he noticed evidences of feeling in those about him, and wrote on his tablet: "I do not want anybody to be distressed on my account."

This was probably the last he was able to write, he having written his instructions to his family on Tuesday night. The death of the honored warrior has made a deep impression throughout Christendom. Our entire country exhibits evidence of the profound sorrow of the American people. In London, flags were displayed at half-staff, and portraits of the honored dead were displayed draped in mourning.

On Thursday President Cleveland issued an eloquent and feeling Proclamation, ordering all honors to the memory of the Hero gone.

An excellent cast was taken of the General's face was taken soon after his death. The remains have been embalmed and they will be removed to New York. The day of the funeral has not been fixed, nor has the place of burial been determined on, the General having left the selection to his son, Col. Fred.

HOMES FOR ALL.

That much-abused corporation, the Central Pacific Railroad Company continues its good work of inviting immigration to our State, the population of which has been greatly increased through the immigration agents the Company had in the Eastern and Western States, and the liberal terms on which it sold its railroad lands, enabling a poor man to make a home among us almost on his own terms. To further encourage immigration and the making of homes in California the Company has made some changes in its rules for the sale of lands, in the interest of the settler. Formerly the purchaser paid down 20 per cent, of the price, and 7 per cent. interest on the remainder, in all about 25 per cent. of the entire cost, the balance being paid within five years. Under the new rules the purchaser has two years to complete his first payment, 12½ per cent. of the total cost each year, and six years in which to complete the payments. The Company will also lease grazing land to owners of stock, but without sufficient means to purchase lands. On the above terms an industrious man can make a home that will be worth big money to him long before his last payment is due. How much better it would be for the Oregon-fever stricken Californian to buy railroad lands in this State, where he can enjoy railroad transportation and a cash market for his produce, than take chances in a State where a big American dollar is seldom seen outside of Portland, and where there are no markets, and no rapid transit.

It is said that the big trees discovered last year in Pleasant Valley, Tulare county surpass any in the Calaveras grove, some of them measuring twenty-eight and thirty feet in diameter. Trees four feet in diameter are 200 feet high, and the eight-feet trees are 400 high. A wagon road has just been completed, and it may become a favorite place of resort—so the Sacramento Bee is informed.

Judge William R. Cantwell, a veteran of the Mexican War, and Police Judge of Sacramento a few years ago, died in San Francisco on Saturday last, aged 65. He was buried at Sacramento.

PROVIDE FOR THOSE ALREADY HERE.

During the fiscal year ending June 30th, 387,821 immigrants arrived in this country, being 122,013 less than last year, and 401,174 less than '82. It would not set the country back any if we had no further immigration. We can get along comfortably with the 50,000,000 or more people we now have in this country. The natural yearly increase from the adult portion of our present population would be found sufficient for the health and general prosperity of the country and its people. It is patent to every thinking mind in the country, that of late we have been receiving an undesirable immigration. It would be better for the whole country if each Western State desiring a good class of population, should send its agents to New York, Philadelphia, and all the other large cities of our great country and select the poor and deserving families to be found therein, and assist them to come West and make homes and people the country. Why should the Immigration Associations of California flood [illegible] with rose-colored circulars, inviting [illegible] to our greatly favored State, [illegible] already filled with intelligent and industrious, but poor, adopted citizens, who with a little help would become a valuable acquisition to our State? If a family has had more company pour in on it than it can see its way clear to accommodate, it will not be apt to send out invitations for more visitors, until after they had provided accommodations for those present; and the United States, through the Immigration Commissioners of the several States, should find homes for those it has invited, and not send out more invitations, and when the recipients reach our hospitable shores compel them to be "tramps" and eventually drift into the criminal element. Before inviting any further foreign immigration we should assist those already here to homes, that they may become useful and valuable citizens.

A DIFFERENCE.—Secretaries Whitney and Endicott, accompanied by their wives and a party of friends, arrived at Newport Sunday morning, on the U. S. steamer Dispatch. They claim to be "inspecting fortifications;" but in the days of Republican administrations the Democrats used to call this business "junketing." Singular that a little matter of politics should make such a vast difference in definitions. We hope Republican journals will not stoop to the level of some of their contemporaries of opposite faith and criticise officers of the Government unjustly.—S. F. Evening Post.

Certainly not: but it makes a great difference to some people as to whose ox it is that is being gored.

Lawton, the new Superintendent of the San Francisco Mint has already filed nearly 3,000 applications for situations under him. And yet, we used to be told that Republicans were an army of office hunters.

THE UNION.

BRIDGEPORT, JULY 25, 1885.

LOCAL INTELLIGENCE.

A FISHERMAN'S PARADISE.—Controller Dunn returned last evening from a five weeks' tour through the wilds of Mono county. His health was greatly improved by the trip, and the only drawback to the mountain fastnesses of Mono as health resorts, is that they are difficult of access. Still, the Controller says he met half a dozen camping parties as he was coming out. The Controller says that at Twin Lakes, a few miles above Bridgeport, he found the best fishing he ever experienced, and that he and M. F. Tarpey landed 223 silver trout.—Sacramento Bee, 18th.

We beg leave to enter our protest to the assertion that our health resorts "are difficult of access." Surely, the Controller did not desire a better road than the one to Sam. Fales' Hot Springs. There is a wagon road to the Lakes, but it may not be quite as good as the Riverside, or Golden Gate Park drives, but it is good, nevertheless, and buggies go over it every day. To the Buckeye Springs there is a good road, and [illegible] the Controller visited Mono Lake he will not say the road was bad. If the pleasure resorts of our people can be reached over good wagon roads, how can they be "difficult of access?" We think the Controller was switched off our roads by his friend Tarpey, to seek the "health resorts" of Tarpey's band of cattle he has driven to our hills for its health, and in that case it is probable he found "a hard road to travel."

WHO IS IT?—Who is furnishing liquor to Indians in this town? If found he should be treated to the best coat of tar and feathers our people know how to apply, and he should then be turned over to the United States authorities for punishment. Why should we not do as other counties do, forward such offenders to San Francisco for trial by the Government. The Indians are wards of the Federal Government, and any violation of our laws for their protection should be looked into by the U. S. Courts. It is an expense that should not be saddled on our people, and such offenders would not care to have Uncle Sam get after them the second time, but it is a pleasure, rather, to be kept in our county jail, particularly during the Winter months.

FIRE.—Hemewill's sawmill, in Buckeye canyon, with a lot of lumber, etc., was burned on Sunday last. The fire is supposed to have been caused by the carelessness of fishermen, who made a fire near to cook their fish, and left without extinguishing it. It was a well appointed mill, but had not been running lately.

A SIMPLE REMEDY FOR RHEUMATISM.

As the rheumatism has been somewhat prevalent in this section, we publish the following for the benefit of those whom it may concern. The remedy cannot be bad to take, and if it does no good, it is not to be supposed it will do harm:

A German correspondent of an English paper writes as follows: "I had a severe attack of inflammatory rheumatism, and was healed in two days time by a soup made of the stalk and root of celery; therefore I desire to make this simple remedy known through the columns of your valuable paper for the benefit of all sufferers from gout or rheumatism of any form. I was induced to try it by seeing the following notice: 'Numerous cures of rheumatism by the use of celery have recently been announced in English papers. Few discoveries, or what claim to be discoveries, of the healing virtues of plants are continually being made. One of the latest is that celery is a cure for rheumatism; indeed, it is asserted the disease is impossible if the vegetable be cooked [illegible] The fact that it is always put on the table raw prevents its therapeutic powers from being known. On Feeding Horses.

Benjamin Franklin has said that "Experience keeps a dear school, but fools will learn in no other." This is indeed very true, yet notwithstanding we go on from day to day, paying dearly for our experience. Thousands of horses and cattle are lost annually by injudicious modes of feeding, which a little care or forethought or attention to the warnings of experience would have averted. Physicians tell us that all sudden changes in our diet and modes of living are more or less injurious and often dangerous. This is the result of experience, yet we pay very little attention to it. They calculate with a good deal of certainty that in the autumn months they will have plenty of practice on diarrhœa, dysentery, cholera morbus, etc. Again in the spring months diseases of the [illegible] and lungs, and throat, will prevail, and so on. Yet the great masses [illegible] take no heed whatever,—[illegible] consequences are often sad to contemplate, yet we still blindly and ignorantly drive on.

We have reason to believe that animals in the state of nature are not much troubled with disease—their instincts teach them to avoid improper [illegible] excesses, but the case is very different when they become subservient to man. During my practice and experience as a veterinary surgeon, I have been curious to note the intimate connection of cause and effect in the matter of feeding horses. I have observed that when we begin to feed with new hay, new oats, new corn (more especially) we have a great number of cases of diseases of the stomach and bowels in the form of tympanites, gastritis, inflammation of the bowels, colic, staggers, dysentery, etc., etc. Now all this catalogue of serious diseases is mostly brought on by improper feeding and management in other respects. That thousands of horses and cattle are lost annually by these diseases none no one can deny.

Those who raise a considerable amount of live stock will do well to attend to the following hints. Ruminating animals (those who chew their cud) merely crop their food in the first instance and it passes into the rumen or paunch and is afterward returned to the mouth and masticated at their leisure. It will be observed that cows and oxen chew their cud when at rest. This is a natural and necessary requirement. The food is thereby intimately mixed with the saliva, which, with the gastric juice, is essential to the elimination of nutriment. Think, then, of the evil of putting a yoke of cattle to hard work immediately after feeding.

The horse, however, is differently constituted; his stomach is (taking his size into consideration) very small—admirably adapted to his motion of speed, and those who are most experienced in the care of horses, and who require fast work, are very careful as to their mode of feeding. Horses trained for racing and trotting get very little hay, and the same rule applies to well-conducted livery and omnibus stables. This is the result of experience. Let us then take a lesson from them; it will be useful.

In European countries the horses which are used for agricultural purposes are of a heavy, ponderous build, in general well adapted for slow work; and it is the custom to drive them at a slow, even, pace, and cut feed is very generally adopted with advantage.—The American farmer is, however, differently circumstanced; he wants his horse for general purposes, and has as much fast as slow work, and, as a rule, it would be well to avoid feeding or watering horses either immediately before or immediately after meals. Give them a little time after feeding and let them grind their own food. If you change their food do it gradually, mix old and new hay together for a while in the commencement; the same with new oats.—A. J. Wilson, V. S.

Goodson's Ore Pulverizer,
THE JUGGERNAUT.
PATENTED OCTOBER 7, 1884.

ONE THOUSAND PER CENT. MORE ECONOMICAL than any ore reducing machine ever before invented.

A sixty horse power machine pulverizes 1,000 TONS of ore in twenty four hours.

The attention of mining men and all persons who are interested in mining industries, is most respectfully called to the JUGGERNAUT ORE PULVERIZER, and those contemplating the erection of any kind of reduction works will do well to thoroughly examine the JUGGERNAUT before purchasing or erecting any other kind of quartz mill. In fact, those using stamps will find it a great saving to discontinue their use, and put JUGGERNAUT in their place. It is the most durable, simple in construction, inexpensive to operate, and capable of producing the greatest results of any ore pulverizing machine ever before known. There is no loss of time, like the stamp battery, and no waste of power whatever, hence, with the JUGGERNAUT, it is easy to pulverize from five to SIXTY TONS per hour at a cost of not more than 25 cents per ton in any case, which will be reduced in proportion as the capacity is increased.

What the cotton gin is to the planter; the reaping machine to the farmer; the sewing machine to the seamstress and tailor; the railroad and telegraph to the merchant and commercial man, the JUGGERNAUT ORE PULVERIZER will prove to be to the miner.

HOUSEHOLD RECEIPTS.

For a Cold.—Drink a tea made by steeping together equal parts of catnip, spearmint and sassafras. Steep, but do not let the tea boil; put the feet also into hot water.

Snowden Pudding.—Half pound bread crumbs, half pound beef suet, half pound moist sugar, the rind and juice of two lemons, three eggs. Boil two hours, serve with wine sauce.

Boston Pie, without shortening: Three eggs, one cup of sugar, one and a-half cups flour, one teaspoon cream tartar, half teaspoon soda, salt. Bake on two round tins, when cold split and fill.

To Take out Grease.—Dry buckweat flour, if repeatedly applied, will remove entirely the worst grease spots on carpets or any woolen cloth, and will answer as a French chalk for grease spots on silk.

Water Cake.—One cup sugar, two eggs, half cup butter, one cup water, two teaspoons cream tartar, one teaspoon soda; beat the butter and eggs to a cream, then add the other ingredients; stir well, bake quick.

To Cook Eggs Nicely.—Put them in boiling water, cover close and set them on the hearth; let them remain fifteen minutes. This will cook them clear through without hardening the white. The difference in the flavor is astonishing.

Filling.—Two eggs, half cup of flour, one cup sugar stirred in a pint of boiling milk. Flavor with vanilla. Stir constantly to keep from scorching; put half in one pie; put on the top and sift pulverized sugar on or put on frosting.

Roman Soup.—Twelve potatoes sliced and soaked in cold water one hour; boil in one quart water till tender, strain or mash well, add one pint milk, and let it scald with one onion, butter, pepper, and salt, and one bay leaf; chop parsley fine and throw in just before serving.

To Change Red Hair to Light or Yellow.—Put a heaping tablespoonful of baking soda or saleratus in a quart of water and wash the head and hair with it. Do this three or four times a week, and the hair will become silky and light. Of course the darker the hair the longer time it will require to bleach it.

Sweet Biscuits.—Rub four ounces of butter into eight ounces of flour, add six ounces of ground loaf sugar, the yolks of two eggs, the white of one and a tablespoonful of brandy. Roll the paste thin and cut it with a wine-glass or cutter; egg over the top of each with the remaining white and sift on sugar; bake in a moderate oven.

Eating Fruit.—A distinguished physician has said that if his patients would make a practice of eating a couple of good oranges before breakfast from February to June his practice would be gone. The principal evil is that we do not eat enough of fruit; that we injure its finer qualities with sugar; that we drown them in cream. We need the medical actions of the pure fruit acid in our system and their cooling, corrective influence.

Ham Sandwiches.—Boil the ham; take one-third fat, two-thirds lean, chop fine, add a small teaspoonful each of pepper sauce and Worcestshire, a little mustard and cayenne pepper; mix thoroughly and keep in a tightly-covered bowl. To make sandwiches, slice your bread evenly, spread thinly with butter, then spread with the prepared ham, thickly or thinly, as suits your taste; cut the slices across, and place the halves together with the ham between.

Chicken Pie.—Cut up a large chicken; if it is tough parboil it. Place your crust in a deep, well-buttered pudding dish; then a layer of thin salt pork, and on that a layer of chicken; pepper it; chop up two or three hard-boiled eggs, and sprinkle some over the chicken; then more pork, chicken and egg, until the chicken and half pound of pork is used up; pour in enough of the water in which it was parboiled to make a gravy cover with a crust; ornament it a little; bake an hour, or longer if the pie is very large.

Lemon Pudding.—Nine eggs, the whites beaten to a stiff froth, two lemons, the grated rind and juice, one pound of sugar, three ounces or a little less of butter creamed, one pint of milk and one and a half even tablespoonful of flour. Beat the yolks and sugar until very light, add the butter, with which the flour has been smoothly mixed, then the lemons, the milk and the eggs, which must be beaten in slowly, gently, and thoroughly. Bake in deep, paste-lined plates, and put in a quite hot oven, reducing the heat after the first eight or ten minutes.

Epicurean Butter.—Boil and skin four anchovies or sardines, and chop them fine; chop a tablespoonful of chives, and the same quantity of tarragon leaves, four small pickles, the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs; mix with these ingredients a level teaspoonful of French mustard, a saltspoonful of salt, and two ounces of sweet butter, pass them all through a fine seive with the aid of a wooden spoon. Put it on the ice to cool, and then mould it in balls the size of a walnut, by rolling small lumps between two little wooden paddles. Serve it with crackers and cheese.

Important Facts to Those who Burn Kerosene.—Kerosene oil is one of the products derived from refining crude petroleum as it comes from the well. The oil is always more or less dangerous, according to the amount of volatile gases left in it. Every lamp filled with the fluid is liable to explode after burning several hours. Caution 1. Keep the metallic parts of the lamp clean and the air passages open. 2. After the lamp has been burning three or more hours at one time, never relight again until refilled. 3. In extinguishing the light turn the wick down quite low and allow a few seconds to intervene before blowing out the flickering flame, or, better still, do not blow it out, but let it flicker out.

There are times when bread accumulates and is thrown away. We cannot make toast, for we have only just a little milk to spare. Let us tell you how to make a good sized dish of toast with only one cupful of milk—or none at all. Toast each slice of bread nicely and brown; have a basin of clean hot water on the stove; salt the hot water and dip each slice of toast, one at a time, into it. Let it remain a moment. Then lay it on the dish you wish to serve it in. Immediately on taking it from the hot water lay a thin slice of butter on each piece of bread, and so on until your dish is full. It is good just so. But to give it the appearance of milk toast, heat your small quantity of milk, add a little lump of butter, a pinch of salt, and hot water enough to just cover the toast and no more. If you have scraps and broken crusts which cannot be toasted, do not throw them away, but soak them until soft with warm water. Add pepper, salt, and butter, according to taste, and finely cut onion, also, according to taste. Mold into balls like an egg and lay them in a pan with with roast beef; turn them when brown, and serve with rich gravy, and you will think it a rich nutritious dish.

Never too late to mend—old shoes.

Who Named the Colleges.

Harvard College was named after John Harvard, who, in 1638, left to the college £779 and a library of over 300 books.

Williams College was named after Col. Ephraim Williams, a soldier of the old French war.

Dartmouth College was named after Lord Dartmouth, who subscribed a large amount, and was President of the first board of Trustees.

Brown University received its name from Hon. Nicholas Brown, who was a graduate of the college, went into business, became very wealthy, and endowed the college very largely.

Columbia College was called King's College till the close of the war for independence, when it received the name of Columbia.

Bowdoin was named after Gov. Bowdoin, of Maine.

Yale College was named after Elihu Yale, who made very liberal donations to the college.

Colby University, formerly Waterville College, was named after Mr. Colby, of Boston, who gave $50,000 to the college in 1866.

Dickinson College received its name from Hon. John Dickinson. He made a very liberal donation to the college, and was President of the Board of Trustees, for a number of years.

Cornell University was named after Ezra Cornell, its founder.

Be Sensible.

Do not be above your business. He who turns up his nose at work quarrels with bread and butter. He is a poor smith who is afraid of his own sparks; there's some discomfort in all trades except chimney sweeping. If sailors give up going to sea because of the wet; if bakers left off baking bread because it is hard work; if ploughmen would not plough because of cold, and tailors would not make our clothes for fear of pricking their fingers, what a pass we would come to. Nonsense, my fine fellow, there's no shame about any honest calling; don't be afraid of soiling your hands, there's plenty of soap to be had.

All trades are good to good traders. Lucifer matches pay well if you sell enough of them. You cannot get honey if you are frightened at bees, nor plant corn if you are afraid of getting mud on your boots. When bars of iron melt under the south wind; when you can dig the fields with toothpicks; blow ships along with fans; manure the crops with lavender water, and grow plum cases in flower pots, there will be a fine time for dandies; but until the millennium comes we shall all have a deal to put up with.

Don't Worry about Yourself.

To retain or recover health, persons should be relieved from anxiety concerning disease. The mind has power over the body—for a person to think he has a disease will often produce that disease. This we see effected when the mind is intensely concentrated upon the disease of another. We have seen a person sea-sick in anticipation of a voyage, before reaching the vessel. We have known people to die of cancer in the stomach, or any other mortal disease. A blindfolded man slightly pricked in the arm, has fainted and died from believing he was bleeding to death. Therefore, persons, to remain well, should be cheerful and happy; and sick persons should have their minds diverted as much as possible. It is by their faith that they die. As a man thinketh, so is he. If he wills not to die, he can often live in spite of disease; and, if he has little or no attachment to life, he will slip away as easily as a child will fall asleep. Men live by their minds as well as by their bodies. Their bodies have no life of themselves; they are only receptacles of life—tenements for their minds, and the will has much to do in continuing the physical occupancy or giving it up.

Advantages of Crying.

A French physician is out in a long dissertation on the advantages of groaning and crying in general, and especially during surgical operations. He contends that groaning and crying are two grand operations by which nature allays anguish; that those patients who give way to their natural feelings more speedily recover from accidents and operations than those who suppose it unworthy a man to betray such symptoms of cowardice as either to groan or cry.

He tells of a man who reduced his pulse from one hundred and twenty-six to sixty in the course of a few hours by giving full vent to his emotions. If people are at all unhappy about anything, let them go into their rooms and comfort themselves with a loud boo-hoo, and they will feel a hundred per cent. better afterward.

In accordance with the above, the crying of children should not be too greatly discouraged. If it is systematically repressed the results may be St. Vitus' dance, epileptic fits, or some other disease of the nervous system. What is natural is nearly always useful, and nothing can be more natural than the crying of children when anything occurs to give them either physical or mental pain.

Plain Talk to Girls.

Your every day toilet is a part of your character. A girl who looks like a "furry" or a sloven in the morning, is not to be trusted, however finely she may look in the evening. No matter how humble your room may be, there are eight things it should contain, viz.: a mirror, washstand, soap towel, comb, hair, nail and tooth brushes. Those are just as essential as your breakfast before which you should make good and free use of them. Parents who fail to provide their children with such appliances not only make a great mistake, but commit a sin of omission. Look tidy in the morning, and after the dinner work is over, improve your toilet.

Make it a rule of your daily life to "dress up" in the afternoon. Your dress may, or need not be, anything better than calico; but with a ribbon, or flower, or some bit of ornament, you can have an air of self respect and satisfaction, that invariably comes with being well dressed.

A Salutary Remark.

When I was a young man, there lived in our neighborhood a farmer who was usually reported to be a very liberal man, and uncommonly upright in his dealings. When he had any of the produce of his farm to dispose of, he made it an invariable rule to give good measure—rather more than would be required of him. One of his friends observing him frequently doing so, questioned him as to why he did it; he told him he gave too much, and said it would be to his disadvantage. Now, dear reader, mark the answer of this excellent man:

"God has permitted me but one journey through the world, and when I am gone I cannot return to rectify mistakes."

Think of this. There is but one journey through life.

A Greek Woman, says Milnes, in his Eothen, wears her whole fortune on her person in the shape of jewels or gold coins; I believe that this mode of investment is adopted in a great measure for safety's sake. It has the advantage of enabling a suitor to reckon as well as to admire, the object of his affection.

CONSUMPTION,

which is Scrofulous Disease of the Lungs, is promptly and certainly arrested and cured by this God-given remedy, if taken before the last stages of the disease are reached. From its wonderful power over this terribly fatal disease, when first offering this now celebrated remedy to the public, Dr. Pierce thought seriously of calling it his "Consumption Cure," but abandoned that name as too limited for a medicine which, from its wonderful combination of tonic, or strengthening, alterative, or blood-cleansing, anti-bilious, pectoral, and nutritive properties, is unequaled, not only as a remedy for consumption of the lungs, but for all
